

Editorial guidelines

This online media channel is open to all EPFL students. Content submitted for publication on this channel must meet the following requirements:

- It must be related to one of EPFL's missions (education, research and innovation) or be intended for amusement, to represent EPFL students, to support students' development or integration, or to contribute to campus life.
- It must be compatible with EPFL's missions.
- It must not have a political focus or leaning, except for debates and issues related to university studies.
- It must not be of a religious nature.
- It must be in French, English, German or Italian.

In order to foster fact-based dialogue and prevent misuse of this media channel, content that contains any one of the following will not be published:

- false information – all facts and information must be true
- defamatory, insulting, abusive or discriminatory statements
- illegal content
- personal attacks
- personal or third-party data without the prior consent of the person or third party in question
- advertisements, spam or other marketing messages

The author must keep the references for sources on which their content is based and provide them to EPFL upon request.

Content published on this media channel does not reflect the views of EPFL. The authors alone are responsible for the content they produce. EPFL cannot be held liable, including in the event that a user commits a criminal offense, makes insulting or false statements, makes a misleading omission, violates intellectual property rules, behaves in a malicious way, makes a personal attack, or performs any other harmful act.

Content published on this media channel may not be reproduced by third parties without the author's prior consent.
